RESEARCH IN PROGRESS

My primary areas of focus are Race and Ethnicity, Urban Sociology, and the Sociology of Sport. Currently, I am interested in how some institutions shape situational contexts and how individuals within those contexts negotiate, interpret, and define race, class, culture, and identity. I am currently working on three projects that address these concerns. In the first project, I use the case of urban nightlife to examine how race and culture influence interactional dynamics across categories of nightlife participants. I pay particular attention to the direct influence of local government and nightclub management decision-making on interpersonal interaction among groups.

The second project is an NSF supported project that explores the role of mentorship among students who participate in the Louis Stokes STEM program. We are particularly focused on the ways in which mentorship interactions are influenced by the negotiation of race, class, and ethnic identities among the mentors and mentees.

The third project uses interviews of university alumni who were participants in an on-campus leadership program to explore the ways in which participants in the program come to develop leadership identities and how those identities are influenced by students' formal and informal participation in the overall campus life.
